

Opportunities for Foreign Activist Investors to Take Advantage of Korea's Shifting Corporate Landscape

Fresh developments in the shareholder activist landscape in Korea have made it more favorable for foreign activist investors to find new opportunities and push for change, even against the biggest chaebols. Our team explains what these developments mean and how investors can take advantage.

January 18, 2023

The Korean corporate landscape is becoming more favorable for activist campaigns.

With continuing chaebol (family-owned conglomerate) restructurings as well as a growing trend towards a more nuanced approach to activism, foreign activist investors looking to maximize their value need to find a new balance between various nuanced shareholder priorities on the one hand, and the changing priorities of different chaebol management teams on the other.

New Controversies and Approaches

Two major developments in 2022 stand out, indicating shifts in the activist landscape in Korea:

Spin-off and IPO controversy: Despite the new Korean presidential administration announcing its intent to scrutinize the often-used spin-off and IPO combination – which involves the spin-off and merger of a valuable business division with a company more tightly controlled by a chaebol family that is then crowned with an IPO – 2022 saw a continued trend of chaebol restructuring at the expense of shareholders. The latest example is SK Group, the second largest chaebol. Still, once the government's plan materializes, we may see changes.

Softer, governance-focused approach: Many Korean local activist funds have taken a softer, governance-focused approach in response to public criticism (whether fair or not). For example, local funds Flashlight Capital Partners and Anda Asset Management have a small combined stake in tobacco maker KT&G, but through friendly relationships, have led to the company to respond to their demands by unveiling plans to buy back shares and increase dividends.

These recent trends have led to notable activist victories, often resulting in a substantial rise in share prices. Align Partners Asset Management's recommendations to SM Entertainment led to the latter's stock price to rise 5%, and KT&G stock rose 12.6% two weeks after the start of the activist campaign.

With these opportunities opening up, foreign activist investors should consider deploying creative strategies to maximize their position. This may include allying with key domestic institutional and even retail investors, launching an on-the-ground public relations campaign, leveraging Korean shareholder participation rules and building a cooperative approach with controlling shareholders or management.

The trends above point to a shift towards a more favorable environment in Korea for activist investors. With annual meetings approaching for many chaebols, investors should consult with on-the-ground counsel who can navigate the intricacies of Korean law and local advocacy in order to make the most out of the opportunities and maximize shareholder value.
